Library Vandalists

The library on the campus is a place to study, with catalogued indices and references on anything from the letter A to Z for student use. Recently, a librarian brought forth a matter of great concern and presented it to our editor. It is about students who use improper references, like long, loose orientation classes using reference books on labor leaders and a book was returned by the borrower with several pages torn out. The last pages were those about the union labor leaders. The student who tore these pages out of the book deprived others of the chance to secure information on the assigned work. Students who deface, tear or damage any library books forget to think about the students who are going to use them in the future. If you check out books from the library, return them undamaged! Students will appreciate your thoughtfulness and will also have the class work turned in on time.

Are We Study Slaves?

"Two hours of homework for every class period? Pardner, when you say that, you mean it!"

The general opinion around ye olde alma mater seems to be that eight hours of book-reading plus four hours of class is a little too much to expect from one student. Add to this 12 hours another thing for melts and eight for slumber. If you waste more than 50 minutes on such luxuries as transportation, recreation, sharpening your pencil and scratching your head, you will get a lot of the former left over.

When faculty members suggest such a schedule they are following the example set by colleges elsewhere. When they ask for two hours they are hoping for enough study to get the job done. What they get is usually 15 minutes or half an hour. As an excuse, they can give you the social function for a subject, nor it is too little time if it is used correctly, at least for most students. Orientation instructors this week were stressing good study habits and one made a noteworthy comment. He said that it is a wonderful feeling to come to class and know something about what is going on. If you are tired of wandering a blank book in class, you might consider improving your study habits. It probably would be a wonderful feeling.
