Should We Question Tradition?

Students who pick up, contain, sabotage, or destroy the feeling of the night one way or another also show some signs of the anxiety and uncertainty of the students who are interested in keeping a part of the college tradition...The mood and trend supporters have been nagging and prodding the orchestra to look at the student body, to get responses from students and then to consider the student opinion in deciding the future of the orchestra. The letter was the first step to take the "catch and walk" attitude. This is based on the belief that the student support gives the orchestra its identity. The change is only temporary, it will disappear after the fall fairs.

The question now is: Why any group of students who slanders the orchestra, afraid that a small change will hurt the group's popularity? Readers are asked to write their comments to our suggestion to give us a new date for the orchestra's new concert. If the majority of the students are against having orchestra concerts, the school would have no orchestra.

Would we dare think of not having a concert season? Unless we start thinking some steps up and in opposition, something of this sort could happen. A small group of students can never force a larger group of students to do something they don't want to do.

Since the orchestra problem is a big one, it will take the efforts of all of us to avert. You and your friends make BC's concert season a better one. They can help by following the concert season rules, and by encouraging their friends to do so.
