In a sprawling campus, BC President Dr. John Collins announced last week that the college would continue with the early start calendar for next year. The announcement came after sweeping complaints from students about the administration's schedule relative to the traditional late-start schedule.

Collins originally made his recommendations to return to the traditional calendar in light of an impoundment caused by Board of Audit officials at the Office of Research and Development, which indicated that student enrollments were overwhelmingly against A. Of the 6,000 student surveyed, 80% per cent responded affirmatively to the following question: "Are you absolutely, 100 per cent sure that you would cancel next semester if BC was to return to the late-start calendar?"

For this reason, the students and faculty alike were quite surprised by Collins' announcement last week that BC would continue out of the early-start calendar. Administration sources assured us that Collins was pleased with student complaints after his recommendations to the Board of Trustees. "The phones were ringing off the hook and the campus was always full of angry students," commented one administrator. "If you're going to build it, Dr. Collins had to cancel next semester if BC was to return to the late-start calendar!"

The decision of the campus's leaders, Folk Dr. Collins, I thought there was a definite trend among students opposing the late start calendar."

In discussing the measure number of students, Collins previously stated, "I'm sure you're saying the same way some students feel, however, in making my decision, I have decided to put all students' factors seen."

Sacharin ban - sour deal

A few weeks ago the Food and Drug Administration announced a ban on asparagin, a natural substitute for saccharin. The ban was prompted by concerns that asparagin could cause cancer in experimental animals. However, the announcement was met with widespread concern that the ban could result in higher sugar consumption and eventual health problems.

The ban on saccharin, a sweetener commonly used in diet sodas, has raised concerns about public health. Some experts argue that saccharin should be banned entirely, while others contend that it is safe to consume in moderation. The decision to ban saccharin has been criticized as a political move by the food industry, which stands to lose billions of dollars in revenue if consumers switch to sugar.

With the ban on saccharin, many are left wondering how they will continue to enjoy their favorite foods. Many restaurants and food manufacturers are already struggling to come up with alternative sweeteners that are both delicious and healthy. Some are exploring the use of artificial sweeteners, while others are focusing on developing new recipes that don't rely on sweeteners at all.

As the debate over the saccharin ban continues, it's clear that the issue is far from resolved. The health risks associated with consuming too much sugar are well documented, but finding a suitable replacement for saccharin won't be easy. In the meantime, consumers are urged to be mindful of their sugar intake and to seek out healthier alternatives when possible.

Take 300 brightly colored eggs and place them in a sandpit, and you get what was advertised as the world's largest egg hunt. The day the egg hunt was held. On April 4, students and families flocked to the Egg Hunt Field near the quadad campus to participate in the event. The egg hunt, which was organized by the Student Activities Board (S.A.B.), set out to break a Guinness World Record. The egg hunt was divided into sections, with each section containing 100 eggs. The students and families were divided into groups and each group was given a time slot to search for the eggs. The egg hunt was a great success, with participants enjoying the outdoors and having fun.
