SECURITY: Sheriff makes bid for handling campus security

The Sheriff's Department of the BPD who would be the administrative liaison and would be hired when certain things happened, and brought to the decision-making process when appropriate.

This change also would have ramifications on the current officers, who would have to be merged with the outside agency according to Michael Noland, president of the local chapter of the California School Employees Association.

"These are distinct employees," Noland said.

"They cannot be fired when they're contracting out. These are permanent, classified employees who have job security and job protection. That's against the education code, and it's a violation of the law. They would have to be compensated.

Larry emphasized that there would not be a plan to dismiss current campus police officers, and that they would be welcomed to other positions if they didn't qualify as security officers.

Kern County Sheriff Carl Sparks said that the Sheriff's Department is in reality to compete with BC if that decision is made.

"We made a proposal to BC to take over security. There was a study done and the will of the students and faculty is that they want full-time campus guards. You would be getting full-time deputies."

Sparks said it would be a problem to raise the current force and the Sheriff's Department.

"They would have to meet our qualifications and pay (tax), but they would be welcome.

...if we don't do something to stop this. This is my opinion, the area should be secured to disallow public dumping." The school officer in charge of campus security.

"All of the students are pursuing a career in law enforcement," he said. "This is just another wave on what is the problem.

"We also plan on having campus security keep a watchful eye on the areas around us. It is an organized manner. I'm not surprised that campus police have noticed more illegal dumping on campus.

"It is the problem they should be solved," Sparks said.
Faculty seeks 'reasonable' district contract

BY MICHAEL D. ROSS
Editor in Chief

Jack Fulks says he is tired of fighting for a reasonable faculty contract.

"I feel like I've give it all and I say, 'This is the state average. Let's do it.'

Fulks, a member of the faculty contract negotiations team, has been pursuing continuing his teaching career at other colleges in the state where faculty pay is closer to the state average. Fulks maintains that their present salaries and proposed increases are among the lowest in the state.

"I am looking at other schools," Fulks said. "I am, in fact, applying, I am running away from the place has, as I fail, because I am leaving larger.

"When does right mean that, that's educated, would count in this school at my level for $50,000 when they could be making $60,000 a another institution. And the positions is not at the very top. This is right time.

"If I'm right in group of there in the middle group of institution. This is competition," Fulks expressed concern during the faculty meeting last week that the district cannot keep its level or level that changes in the state average, BC's proposed salaries to a satisfactory level.

The district presented the faculty with a proposed contract that included local increases and a zero percent salary increase over three years.

"I know negotiating is hard enough staff in some ways, like buying house—office, like back and forth and back and forth, and sometimes I feel a bit, this is what we have to offer to be zero, zero, zero," said Kate Kelly, a counselor on the faculty negotiations team.

The faculty expressed concern during the meeting that the Board of Education might take their proposal next to the district officials. Fulks then proposed a strike.

The faculty has traditionally opposed striking against contract demands.

However, a show of hands was called at week's meeting asking who would be willing to strike if the district does not raise any funds were raised.

"It certainly sounded to me that people were angry enough that they wanted to do something," said Faculty negotiations team chair Dave Devlin.

Many faculty are looking elsewhere. It's like now having a walking stick.

Opinion

When was the last time you saw a true Shriners' parade? Now, I know, kids these days are not going to get the same thrill out of seeing a parade that we did when we were kids. They might even say that it was too corny or too old fashioned. But I'm going to give you a little tip about a true Shriners' parade that played a part in the development of our city.

A local Bakersfield newspaper did a feature on the Shriners' parade in the 1950s. According to the article, the Shriners were more than just a community support group. They were also entertainers.

The article talked about how the Shriners would do magic tricks and make people disappear from their hand and reappear behind a curtain. They would also bring in clowns, musicians, and acrobats to perform for the crowd.

As a kid, I was always amazed by the Shriners' tricks and stunts. They had a way of making people laugh and forget about their problems.

But the Shriners were not just entertainers. They were also philanthropists. They would use their money to build hospitals and support other community organizations.

So the next time you see a Shriners' parade, remember that they are more than just a group of people in funny outfits. They are a group of people who want to make the world a better place.
