Smokers, activists march for pot rights

By Matteo M. Mederos

Participants cheered at the honking support as they walked along the street passing cars hooting their horns in agreement and some signaled the thumbs down at the activists. They walked chanting at the backing support and expressed their feelings and concerns about the prohibitions of marijuana opinions.

Robert Burke, a human services major, said on the illegality of the plant, "They put too many people in jail for it, that's not right. People could be using that money in other places. We're filling prisons, wasting teachers packing boxes to put putting more prisoners away. It costs 546,000, leaving a promise way for a year. That's病房 money and there are a lot of people that have in prison now just for weed."

Erin Sano, a Bakersfield College student who was marching, said, "We came out here today to show some support for the medical use of marijuana, and feel that the police treatment, overcharge white folks, and it's not right because marijuana is good for you. It's scientifically proven that it doesn't have any bad side effects, except cottonmouth and getting sleepy, but besides that, it helps a lot, it balances your mind."

Denise Randolph, a user of medical marijuana since the passage of Proposition 215 in 1996, said on his presence at the march that, "I am here to be a voice for the public, to reverse judgment, to innocent attention the notion that pot is not marijuana's medicine.

Participants utilizing from different ethnicities and illnesses talked about how the plant helps with them better cope with their conditions.

Jeff Clark, President of the Upper Kern County NORML, led the march, instructing people to be loud, and advising them to remain respectful, wait for people at crosswalks, and to stay on the sidewalk and off of people’s lawns.

Upon arrival at the Liberty Bell, Clark with others from NORML, began to speak from the platform on the legalization of marijuana.

"We should stand up for our rights. We have to Rally the vote in 2010, in November and tighten our cause for every one over 21," said Clark.

"We want to increase the use of hemp we want to stop final sale taxing, we want to stand up for cannabis hor we get to vote on bills to legalize hemp for clothing and for textile products. We need to get rid of the vinyl, plastic, plastic that is polluting and killing our planet."

The Bell, which will be up for vote in November, allows anyone over the age of 21 to grow and possess marijuana. The penalties for smoking with someone who is not of legal age can include jail time.

Participants showed for squares around 3:20 p.m. and walked back to Beach Park, still recieving hooks of approval and support as they marched.

Cannabis advocates, medicinal marijuana users and members of the public match from Beach Park to the Kern County Liberty Bell in a demonstration to bring awareness to the reformation of cannabis laws May 1. Participants smoke and give speeches about the current status of laws governing use and future endeavors in the state to vote for full legalization.
